Bob,

Just wanted to drop you a note to thank you for helping me go forward on my career path. Working with you on securing this new position has been a real pleasure.

I've known and worked with "head-hunters" in the past and the general impression I would get each time was a half-done approach to the job, over-promising, and lack of attention to detail. It's traits like this that can give the profession a bad name.

However, in meeting you for the first time, I felt your attention for detail was immediately demonstrated. Your insight into the process, preparation of correspondence, etiquette before during and after the interview... all of it instilled a higher level of confidence through the whole process.

When you boil this down, going into the interview with the best preparation and confidence ensures you the highest chance to get the job offer. If I had not received the offer, I would have at least known I had done my best and that is all anyone can hope for when looking for a job.

There are very few people in your position that take the time to hammer out the details, get to know the applicants and focus on what each side truly wants. Then follows through with a level of detail that ensures the highest level of quality. Thank you for taking your role in the process as seriously as you do.

Best Regards,

David Schenberg
